The forces of globalization, along with the rapid development of knowledge based economies and knowledge societies demand that countries and societies have to be increasingly competitive in the global marketplace in order to survive. A key aspect of this competitiveness is the development of a workforce that is adequately prepared for the labor market via work-integrated learning. This is because in the workplace the demand for cutting-edge knowledge is continually growing and evolving, so that the traditional divide between "education" and "work" is no longer sustainable, least of all in higher education. As a result of this on-going change, no provider institution in the higher education market can afford to ignore work-based learning; the integration of it into higher education curricula is no longer an option, but a necessity to survive in the market.

By taking an action in this direction “Grow More Faculty of Engineering” has organized a one day seminar in campus to spread awareness between students and faculties about skills required to survive in this competitive global market apart from their technical knowledge.
